If we do the post-processing of the machines and the printouts of the results, then the reliability of the system increases.Q: Rails 4 - How to make web service request for multiple users? I have a web service with a REST controller. Basically, the user must select a region (symbol) and then press the submit button. The server will then do some calculations and then email the results. The webservice only accepts the region_id as a parameter, because I'm using a model layer to input the region_id, and because the server will be calculating the results based on that parameter. I think I can have a lot of users doing this at the same time, I would like to understand how I could either be running one user at a time so that they don't hit the server at the same time, or perhaps if I could use an IP ban, or some other way to control how many users can run the web service simultaneously. A: All you need to do is make the URL request of each user different, and store that in a database (or pass the region_id as a parameter). Then use a resourceful route such as and map all requests coming from /services/regions/ to a dedicated controller method. Modern art paintings.
